1. Enzymes are the biological catalysts. Assay of enzymes present in blood plasma or serum have been routinely carried out in clinical chemistry laboratories. Diagnostic enzymes refers to the enzymes that are used directly or as components of the assay system for the determination of number of substances. Changes in the concentrations of various biomolecules are indications of abnormal metabolic activities, infections, infectious and non-infectious diseases and inflammatory conditions. 2. • Use to detect and quantify certain substances • As labels in enzyme immuno assay (EIA) system • There are many alternative techniques which are routinely used for the diagnosis by clinical laboratories and include Electrophoresis, chromatographic techniques, isoelectric focusing etc. 3. Important enzyme found throughout the body and involved in glucose metabolism. Tetramer of 2 different subunits(H or M). LDH1 is found predominantly in heart muscle and in RBCs. Most stable and runs the furthest in electrophoresis strip. LDH5 found in liver and skeletal muscle is the least stable and runs the shortest on electrophoresis. LDH3 is found in a variety of tissues such as spleen, lung, endocrine glands and lymph nodes. 4. The analysis of isoenzyme patterns can help in the investigation of myocardial infarction. Flipped LDH isoenzyme pattern. If plasma is subjected to electrophoresis at pH 8.6, the LDH isoenzymes may then be located by means of specific stain-a mixture of lactate, NAD+ and a chromogen which will form a colored product. Normal value-180-360U/L. 5. These enzymes are found in most tissues through out the body, but especially in skeletal muscle, cardiac muscle, liver and kidney. It is formally known as glutamate oxaloacetate transaminase(GOT). Useful in the diagnosis of myocardial infarction. Elevated AST levels is indicative of damage to the myocardium. Normal range-male 35
